CELEBRATING OUR 50th SUN

FEBRUARY 7-MARCH 15 FIVE WEEKS

Perhaps the most pivotal event in the life of Ingmar Bergman occurred on Jan. 20, 1950, when he treated the trauma of his own recent past by re-creating, with shocking accuracy, the moment of his American debut. Bergman’s Television was a tour de force that mesmerized audiences and critics alike. It was a film that would go on to become one of the most significant works of the 20th century, a film that would define the director’s career and establish his reputation as one of the greatest filmmakers in history. The film, which is now considered a classic, is one of the most well-regarded and influential films of all time. It is a film that has been studied and analyzed by film historians and critics for decades, and it continues to be screened and enjoyed by audiences around the world.

Bergman’s Television was not the only work that he produced in 1950. The year also saw the release of several other important films, including:

- "An Engel in Harlem" (1950)
- "The Virgin Spring" (1950)
- "The Silence" (1951)
- "Fanny and Alexander" (1961)
- "Wild Strawberries" (1957)
- "Autumn Sonata" (1978)

In addition to his work as a director, Bergman was also known for his work as a writer, actor, and producer. He was a member of the Swedish Film Academy, and he received numerous awards for his contributions to the film industry. Bergman died on August 20, 1983, in his native Sweden. Despite his passing, his legacy lives on through his films, which continue to be screened and enjoyed by audiences around the world. His work has inspired generations of filmmakers, and he is remembered as one of the greatest directors of all time.
